Vaccines are vital for global health. Health agencies worldwide create vaccines to prevent Ebola, influenza, and other infectious diseases. Vaccines stop the spread of—and can even eradicate—many communicable diseases. Some health workers travel to remote areas to reach more people, saving lives.

This polio vaccination team in India contributed to a campaign that reported a 94 percent drop in infection rates.